Community-Based Strategies to Tackle Health Disparities and Promote Equity

Message from the Guest Editor

We invite you to submit your research to our Special Issue, entitled “Community-Based Strategies to Tackle Health Disparities and Promote Equity”. This Special Issue will promote health equity through the lens of effective, efficient, and generalizable strategies. This Special Issue’s purpose is to draw attention to the great research being conducted regarding populations impacted by dire health issues that result in negative health outcomes. Submissions will be novel and sustainable, identifying key strategies that can be successful and significant on a general platform. This Special Issue will promote strategies that impact diverse populations in order to promote health equity and population health. Though this Special Issue has a specific focus area, it lies within the scope of Healthcare, a journal aimed at promoting healthcare insights across the spectrum of diseases and patient population. Research areas may include (but are not limited to) the following: health equity, population health, longitudinal evaluations of lifestyles and health outcomes, community engagement efforts, and cost-effectiveness analyses, along with feasibility studies.
