

Special Issue

Healthcare for Immigrants and Refugees

Message from the Guest Editor

Globally, the number of people living outside their countries of birth, either voluntarily or involuntarily, due to war and unrest is increasing. Accessibility and equity of healthcare are growing public health issues, and gaining insight into the facilitators and barriers to migrants and refugees accessing healthcare in their new countries continues to be a contemporary phenomenon of interest in research, education, and practice. In this Special Issue, entitled “Healthcare for Immigrants and Refugees”, we encourage nurses, midwives, and other healthcare providers in the community and healthcare sectors to disseminate findings from empirical studies, systematic reviews, and policy papers among migrants and refugees, humanitarian entrants, and asylum seekers to ensure optimal health outcomes for this growing global population. Research areas may include, but are not limited to, the following: illness and healthcare experiences, health promotion initiatives and evaluations, interdisciplinary and intersectoral approaches, health-seeking behavior for diverse health issues, and screening practices of migrants, refugees, asylum seekers, and humanitarian entrants.
