Interventions, Experiences, and Outcomes in Home and Community-Based Care

Message from the Guest Editors

The demand for home and community-based care (HCBC) is rising, with more individuals seeking support for daily living and health needs in non-institutional and non-clinical settings that promote autonomy, accessibility, and personalized care. As HCBC expands and service models evolve, there is a pressing need for research that clarifies what works, for whom, and under what conditions, and where gaps or system failures persist. This Special Issue will advance the evidence base for HCBC through rigorous research examining interventions, experiences, and outcomes across diverse populations and contexts. We invite HCBC-related contributions on topics including, but not limited, to the following:

- The evaluation of interventions and service delivery models;
- Measures and tools for assessing quality and outcomes;
- Health equity and access;
- Workforce development and sustainability;
- Care coordination;
- The integration of formal and informal caregiving;
- Family caregiver support and paid family caregiving programs;
- Stakeholder experiences and perspectives;
- Policy innovations.
