Care for People with Mental Illness in the Community

Message from the Guest Editors

As the deinstitutionalization movement progresses, many countries have developed community-based mental health systems to care for people with mental illness in the community. There are many challenges for both health care providers and people with mental illness to live in the community. For their successful integration into the community, health care providers consider employment, housing, marriage, and ethical issues, including the rights of people with mental illness, mental illness stigma, and discrimination. We welcome papers exploring sociological and historical perspectives of deinstitutionalization, case management, telehealth interventions, supported housing models, and employment, and care for older persons with mental illness in community-based services. Suitable submissions include a variety of article types: original research papers (qualitative research, quantitative research, and mixed methods research), review articles, book reviews, and opinion pieces from researchers interested in this research topic.
