Information Fusion Based on GIS

Message from the Guest Editors

In recent years, the amount of data and information with reference to geographic location has increased drastically. Especially with the availability of open source software and free data, the integration of multiple sources of information has become an important issue. The Special Issue aims at promoting new and innovative studies, experiences, and models to improve the quality of information derived from many different sources. This Special Issue intends to provide an overview of current research and state-of-the-art processing of information in the context of geographic information systems (GIS). Big data aspects as well as multimodal data acquisition and integration, data and information fusion approaches, and the quality and quantity of topics are some of the possible themes to be covered in this Issue. Authors are welcome to submit manuscripts covering. Prof. (Em.) Dr. J.L. van Genderen
