Spationomy—Spatial Exploration of Economic Data

Message from the Guest Editors

Economic data analysis is a very important part in a decision-making process. Today, the importance of the geospatial component inherent in most economic data is rapidly increasing. Therefore, the added value of introducing geospatial aspects to economic data analyses is highly appreciated. Many economists are implementing the spatial aspect more and more in their research, which creates strong ties between economy and GISscience (and related disciplines); and vice versa. This Special Issue strives to establish a scientific platform for sharing results of an empirical research in the field of “spatial economy”. We invite all contributions that focus on spatial exploration and explanation of (socio)economic data of a contemporary world. Paper submission may be focused regionally as well as at different geographical scales, preferably using quantitative data-driven or methods-driven approaches. Possible application areas include (but are not limited to):
