Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Due to their specific properties, including focusing, spectral bandwidth. or coherence. lasers have become indispensable diagnostic and therapeutic tools in Biomedical Optics. Light absorption, elastic or inelastic (Raman) scattering, and autofluorescence or Optical Coherence Tomography (OCT) are used increasingly for label-free diagnostics of cells or tissues. In addition, numerous fluorescent dyes and fluorescent proteins are available for the detection of diseases or for measuring interactions of pharmaceutical agents. Depending on their power, wavelength, and pulse duration, lasers are also used for coagulation, tissue cutting, or even lithotripsy of bile or kindney stones. This specific volume is dedicated to the large field of biological and medical applications of lasers including spectroscopy and microscopy, light propagation, as well as diagnostic and therapeutic applications.
