Message from the Guest Editor

Dear Colleagues,

Genome editing is becoming a powerful tool for gene functional study and also for improving plants for growth and development as well as tolerance to various abiotic and biotic stress. In the past a couple of years, as new Cas are identified and new bioinformatics tools have been developed; this field has been developing quickly. Currently, it has been widely used in many plant species not only for gene functional study but also for crop improvement. In this Special Issue, both reviews and research papers, as well as method and bioinformatics papers, are welcomed.
