Message from the Guest Editor

As the limitations of Western medicine are more realized, the reappraisal of Traditional Medicine can open new avenues for treatments. A major advantage is that Traditional Medicine has developed over several centuries and has therefore matured much more than Western medicine, which only has a relatively short history. For example, the principle of personalized medicine, one of the pillars of Traditional Medicine, was only quite recently adopted by Western Medicine. We hope that the second issue on Traditional Medicine proceeds on the path started with the first issue, and forms a platform for new research to further strengthen the connection of the world of Traditional Medicine to the Western world.
