Molecular Mechanisms and Treatments of Myocardial Infarction

Message from the Guest Editor

Despite advancements in medical therapy and percutaneous coronary interventions that have reduced mortality rates, heart failure (HF) following acute myocardial infarction (MI) continues to be a significant cause of morbidity and mortality among survivors. This Special Issue offers an extensive review of the latest treatments for MI and heart failure, providing a comprehensive summary of recent molecular insights, identifying potential new therapeutic targets, and discussing cardioprotective strategies published over the past five years.
