Recent Developments in Hearing and Balance Disorders

Message from the Guest Editor

Patients with the ear diseases of hearing loss or imbalance currently have effective interventions available to them. Revolutionary advances have been made in the field of hearing and balance technology in recent decades. Medical and surgical treatment, cochlear and vestibular implants, sign language and subtitling are solutions that allow people to with ear diseases or hearing loss, meaning they are able to access education and communication, thus having the opportunity to develop their potential.

The fundamental objective of this Special Issue dedicated to outlining the recent developments in hearing and balance disorders is to make available to readers the most recent advances in the diagnosis, prognosis and treatment of hearing loss and balance, as well as its effects on communication, cognitive impairment, social isolation or even the effects of impaired balance such as falls, and the frequent association of hearing disorders with others closely related diseases, such as vertigo and imbalance. This Special Issue also includes studies focused on the relationship between chronic inflammatory and autoimmune diseases with audiovestibular manifestations.
