Message from the Guest Editors

This special issue will explore new strategies to predict intracranial aneurysms rupture risk and treatment optimization. Current practice decisions still depend on generalized natural history data which may not match the patient's aneurysm and vessel anatomy. Clinicians often are required to make a best estimate of how their patient's aneurysm will behave. New devices for aneurysm treatment add an additional level of complexity in deciding which treatment strategy to apply. Recent advancements have started to explore the ability to generate personalized medical plans for patient's aneurysms. Articles of particular interest will focus on ways to personalize the diagnosis and treatment of intracranial.
