Recent Advances in Management of Hip Fracture

Message from the Guest Editor

It is the aim of this Special Issue to assemble knowledge and data that look toward the future of hip fracture treatment to improve current results. This might include, e.g., better preventive measures in housing, improved medical treatment of osteoporosis, better and less invasive fixation devices, or the addition of percutaneous injectable "cements". Knowing that approximately 20% of patients might suffer from contra lateral fracture within 2 years, we should also consider prophylactic treatment to the contra lateral hip in the same treatment setting as the broken hip using MIS devices and/or injectable "cements". These and other issues related to the treatment of hip fractures are presented and discussed in this Special Issue.
