

Special Issue

Skin Cancer: From Diagnosis to Personalized Treatment

Message from the Guest Editor

The emergence of adjuvant drug therapies has led to a transformation regarding the diagnosis of melanomas or other serious skin cancers. This Special Issue aims to explore the expanding role of treatments, including surgical and pharmaceutical modalities. We seek contributions that address various treatment strategies, including biomarker-guided immunotherapy selection, optimized surgical margins, and emerging diagnostic tools. We also aim to determine how and when these modalities could be blended in the future to treat skin cancer patients. We welcome the submission of original studies and reviews that elucidate this evolving landscape in dermato-oncology, and will place particular emphasis on work that connects laboratory discoveries with clinical applications to ultimately improve patients' survival and quality of life.
