Review Special Issue Series: Recent Advances in Intensive Care

Message from the Guest Editor

Worldwide interest in the management of critically ill patients has escalated significantly in recent decades. In this regard, Critical Care Reviews are excellent means by which to share and summarize the art and fundamental science that support intensive care practice. Due to the nature of critically ill patient disease onset and clinical courses, the purpose of the present Special Issue is to publish high-quality scientific papers that address recent advances in several key aspects of critical care and are relevant to a broad range of research. The present Special Issue aims to promote developments in evidence-based practice for the therapy and management of critically ill patients.
