Impact of Emerging Pandemic on Global Diseases and Human Well-Being

Message from the Guest Editor

The wide spread of COVID-19 has not only had significant and negative effects on human well-being, sexual desire and behaviours, but it has also had a negative impact on many important diseases. COVID-19 is not the only disease that can affect public health organization and social life. In fact, previous studies demonstrate that declining immunity in the population in the context of urbanization could favour the re-emergence of new/old viruses. At the same time, we cannot forget that low- and middle-income countries have suffered from long-term health system deficiencies, restricted access to health facilities and running water, overcrowding and overpopulation. At the same time, globalization, and the development of relations between different continents could create conditions which could lead to another pandemic or outbreak. In this Special Issue, we invite researchers and clinicians to submit their works, including original clinical research studies and systematic reviews, that will provide additional knowledge on the impact of emerging pandemics and outbreaks of global diseases on human well-being.
