

Special Issue

Targeted Therapy for Cardiac Arrest and Sudden Cardiac Death

Message from the Guest Editors

Sudden cardiac death and cardiac arrest in general are a huge challenge for healthcare systems worldwide on the one hand and a great opportunity for benchmarking systems and improving standardized patient care on the other. Novel developments, such as improvements in CPR or prognostication, or ongoing conflicting topics, such as the worth of eCPR programs, keep the field of resuscitation medicine and science exciting. In late 2025, new CPR guidelines will be published by respective organisations; this is an opportunity to conduct research efforts that will potentially still be considered there. The aim of this Special Issue is to gather upcoming evidence in all fields of resuscitation care and to provide a platform for authors to display their findings. We encourage young and seasoned researchers, small and large groups, and people from low- and high-income regions to submit their cutting-edge research on resuscitation to this Special Issue, and we will be glad to evaluate your original research and reviews.
