Biomarker for Non-small Cell Lung Cancer: From the Bench to the Bedside

Message from the Collection Editor

Lung cancer is a very aggressive disease. Currently, personalizing medicine has acquired a main role in the clinical practice in order to tailor the best treatment for advanced non-small lung cancer patients (NSCLC). Deeply understanding the molecular mechanisms of NSCLC is very important to the development of new drugs and biomarkers through inhibiting driver mutations responsible for disease pathogenesis. Thus, we believe that this Special Issue will be important to publish the latest updated research in NSCLC regarding future trends in prognostic and predictive biomarkers to help oncologists in the provision of the best care. All types of articles will be considered, such as narrative reviews, meta-analyses, original articles, commentaries and editorials.
