"Targeting Residual Cardiovascular Risk": The Road towards Precision Medicine Strategies

Message from the Guest Editor

CAD remains one of the most common causes of mortality and morbidity worldwide, despite significant progresses in this field. Indeed, patients with established CAD are at high risk for recurrent major cardiovascular and cerebral events (MACCE), and even with evidence-based secondary preventive strategies, a consistent residual risk persists.

The goal of this Special Issue is therefore to update clinicians on the current strategies and most recent advances in risk stratification, diagnosis, and therapies in patients with established CAD.
