

Special Issue

The Management of Chronic Heart Failure and Hypertension

Message from the Guest Editor

The ever-increasing life span of the global human population is leading to a new epidemiology of chronic conditions and, in particular, cardiovascular conditions. The number of patients with hypertension and chronic heart failure are increasing, and healthcare systems are starting to fail in providing the traditional paradigms of care. With this Special Issue, we wish to provide a glimpse of the future. We expect you to provide your point of view or best results in terms of personalization of diagnosis and risk stratification and as based on “omics” and artificial intelligence. We want to hear about your proposed mechanisms for diseases that have led to the progression of these conditions towards cardiovascular events; we want to learn how to prevent the progression of hypertension and heart failure, the impact of modern strategies of prevention and treatment based on lifestyles and integrated care; we want to look at the picture of those new technologies, including ICT, mHealth, and eHealth, and what they can capture from the future.
