Clinical Therapy in Dementia and Related Diseases

Message from the Guest Editor

With the rapid aging of society, dementia has become a growing global concern, imposing substantial medical and economic burdens. At the same time, scientifically validated preventive strategies, non-pharmacological treatments, and approaches to enhance patients' quality of life (QOL) are increasingly recognized as essential. Clinical research and social support systems are pivotal areas of focus, demanding innovative solutions and interdisciplinary collaboration. This research topic seeks contributions addressing the following topics:

- Development of disease-modifying therapies (DMTs);
- Advancements in early diagnostic technologies;
- Lifestyle interventions for dementia prevention;
- Management of multimorbidity in dementia patients;
- Validation of non-pharmacological treatments;
- Genetic factors and personalized medicine;
- Targeted treatments for dementia subtypes;
- Improving care quality and nursing support;
- Digital health technologies in diagnosis and treatment;
- Other emerging dementia-related topics.
