Pancreatic Disorder, Pancreatitis, and Pancreatic Cancer: Interconnections, Clinical Challenges, and Therapeutic Advances

Message from the Guest Editors

The pancreas, a vital organ bridging the endocrine and exocrine systems, is at the center of some of the most devastating diseases in modern medicine—including acute/chronic pancreatitis and pancreatic ductal adenocarcinoma (PDAC), one of the deadliest cancers worldwide. This Special Issue aims to highlight cutting-edge research on the interconnected pathophysiology, diagnostic complexity, and therapeutic innovations surrounding pancreatic disease. We welcome high-impact contributions addressing:

- Molecular pathways linking pancreatitis and pancreatic cancer
- Innovative diagnostic techniques for early and accurate detection
- Precision oncology, targeted therapies, and immunotherapy
- Surgical and neoadjuvant strategies in PDAC management
- Translational and interdisciplinary approaches to improving clinical outcomes

This Special Issue provides a timely platform for advancing knowledge on the shared mechanisms and unique clinical challenges of pancreatic diseases—driving progress from bench to bedside.
