Non-aortic Percutaneous Structural Heart Intervention: Ongoing Issues and Challenges

Message from the Guest Editors

Considerable expansion of percutaneous heart structural interventions has been witnessed in the last few decades. In our previous Special Issue, we investigated challenges with transcatheter aortic valve replacement. In Part II of this Special Issue, we would like to focus on the other aspects of structural heart interventions, including, but not limited to, patent foramen ovale or atrial septal defect percutaneous closure, transcatheter mitral/tricuspid valve replacement and clipping, and percutaneous left atrial appendage occlusion. We aim to explore current and future indications and detail the ongoing challenges by providing state-of-the-art reviews and original researches dedicated to each of these interventions.
