Clinical Advances in Transcatheter Aortic Valve Replacement

Message from the Guest Editor

It has now been 22 years since the first transcatheter aortic valve implantation (TAVI) implant. The indications have moved from high-risk to low-risk, as have younger patients. There has been a huge evolution in valve development and delivery systems, imaging, and procedural strategy. Still, we have the issue of durability: “Who lives longer, the valve or the patient”? With TAVI in younger patients, bicuspid valves and aortic regurgitation have to be addressed. The explant of a TAVI valve may be hazardous, but it is an increasing trend in the US. These topics will be discussed by the opinion leaders in this Special Issue.
