New Frontiers in Structural Heart Disease

Message from the Guest Editor

In recent years, the field of structural heart disease has experienced an immense evolution in diagnostic and treatment modalities, including transcatheter aortic valve implantation (TAVI), mitral clip, the percutaneous closure of the left atrial appendage, patent foramen ovale closure et al. These developments have enabled a further understanding of the disease process and improved diagnostic pathways. Further therapeutic solutions are in development for various structural heart disease conditions, while the diagnosis and therapy of these patients is continuously improving, allowing safer, more efficacious, less invasive and more personalized treatment options. The current issue is aimed at presenting cutting-edge research and a review of recent developments in the various structural heart disorders.
