Chronic Pain: Clinical Updates and Perspectives

Message from the Guest Editors

Chronic pain exerts a serious health burden on industrialized societies, being one of the leading causes of disability. Due to its high prevalence, morbidity, and comorbidity with different psychological problems, especially anxiety, depression, insomnia and cognitive disorders, chronic pain is considered one of the diseases that consumes a great deal of health resources. Unfortunately, to date there is no therapy with proven effectiveness for the management of chronic pain. As a consequence, different international resolutions have declared adequate pain therapy as a human right. The scope of this Special Issue is to deepen the diagnosis, treatment, prevention and management of chronic pain in its different spheres, and to deepen and update our knowledge of the investigations that are being conducted in this field, paying special attention to the experiences of people who suffer from chronic pain. Researchers in the field of chronic pain are encouraged to submit an original research or review article to this Special Issue that can provide useful insights into the clinical updates and perspectives directed to the management of chronic pain.
