

Special Issue

Clinical Epidemiology of Diabetes and Its Complications

Message from the Guest Editor

Despite the advancements in the treatment of diabetes, many people still suffer from diabetic complications. Moreover, the recent worldwide outbreak of the novel coronavirus disease 2019 (COVID-19) caused tremendous damage to patients' glycemic control, due to the difficulties encountered in maintaining regular visits to hospitals and a healthy diet, as well as in performing regular exercise. Thus, today's patients with diabetes require treatment and ways to detect and manage diabetes-related complications that can be performed without frequent visits. The present Special Issue aims to provide a broad updated spectrum of knowledge on pathogenetic, diagnostic, and therapeutic aspects of diabetes. Any news incorporating the COVID-19 viral pandemic and its consequences on patients with diabetes, including telemedicine initiatives, is also welcome.
