

Special Issue

New Advances in Retinal Research

Message from the Guest Editor

As we observe a dramatic increase in the number of persons affected by ocular disorders, the identification of mechanisms behind the pathophysiology and therapy of retinal diseases is an area of significant research efforts, attracting scientists from diverse fields, including neuroscience, pharmacology, and medicinal chemistry. This Special Issue is aimed at highlighting the importance of the discovery and mechanistic characterization of novel drug targets, signaling pathways, and pathological mechanisms in different retinal diseases. In addition, this Special Issue will emphasize the importance of retinal imaging in the diagnosis and characterization of these disorders. Papers of interest include, but are not limited to, laboratory and clinical studies on retinal disorders.
