Advanced Research in Marine Environmental and Fisheries Acoustics

Message from the Guest Editors

Understanding the underwater acoustic environment is crucial for assessing the impact of anthropogenic noise, studying marine biodiversity, and monitoring marine ecosystems. This Special Issue aims to showcase cutting-edge research in marine environmental acoustics, encompassing diverse topics such as the impact of anthropogenic noise on marine life, innovative acoustic monitoring techniques, and the role of acoustics in understanding oceanic processes and ecosystem dynamics. Building upon a rich history of acoustic exploration, this Special Issue highlights the evolution of marine environmental acoustics, tracing its roots from pioneering studies in marine mammal communication to contemporary advancements in underwater acoustic technology and its applications in marine conservation and resource management.
