Marine Fish Physiology and Molecular Nutrition

Message from the Guest Editors

As one of the significant global food-producing sectors, aquaculture makes an important contribution to ensuring food security and nutrition in the 21st century. In recent years, fish aquaculture has also been increasingly expanded in response to growing demand. Considering the healthy development of the industry, advancing the understanding of fish physiology and nutrition, as well as further revealing the molecular mechanisms, is essential for the healthy growth of fish and the optimization of rearing techniques. This Special Issue aims to cover the most recent advances in the molecular mechanisms of nutritional regulation in fish physiology, biochemistry, immunology, and metabolism. High-quality original research papers or reviews related to the various aspects mentioned above are encouraged.
