Temporality, Attention, and the Crisis of Communication in the Platform Ecosystem

Message from the Guest Editors

In recent decades, media have undergone not only profound technological and organizational transformations but also a radical reconfiguration of the temporalities and attention economies that structure communication. The rise of digital platforms, mobile interfaces, and algorithmic infrastructures has substantially reshaped the production, circulation, and consumption of information, giving rise to new temporal regimes that deeply affect the experience of the present, the construction of the public agenda, and forms of democratic participation.

This Special Issue will critically explore the relationship between time, attention, and communication in the platform era, adopting theoretical and empirical perspectives that include journalism studies, media studies, political communication, audience studies, and the sociology of time. Our goal is to understand how new temporal regimes shape news production, consumption practices, agenda-building processes, and, more broadly, the conditions of possibility in the contemporary public sphere.
