Message from the Guest Editors

Dear Colleagues,

Gynecological cancers include a large compound of diseases that vary in etiology, biological behavior, and treatment. The five main types of gynecologic cancer are ovarian, uterine, cervical, vaginal, and vulvar cancer. Each of them requires a multidisciplinary management and an accurate diagnostic framework, which is crucial to provide adequate treatment. The continuous technological imaging evolution provides ever more accurate clinical staging and pathologic prediction, increasing the tailoring of disease treatment and improving patient outcomes. Moreover, different imaging modalities and their combinations are increasingly used to guide interventional and minimally invasive procedures performed for diagnostic and therapeutic purposes.

It is our pleasure to invite you to submit to this issue original articles or reviews highlighting milestones and new evidence in the gynecologic oncology field, regarding each diagnostic and interventional method and their related clinical practice algorithms and current recommendations.
