Digital Oral and Maxillofacial Medicine

Message from the Guest Editor

Currently, digitization seems to be essential in the field of oral and maxillofacial medicine and dentistry. Its applications range from diagnostic tools including digital imaging, digital impressions, and manufacturing of jaw models to the three-dimensional planning of complex oral rehabilitation with bone augmentation and implant insertion. This Special Issue of the Journal of Personalized Medicine aims to emphasize the current state of the art and some of the latest innovations in digital methods being applied to the oral and maxillofacial area. Reviews and articles elucidating new aspects of established and new techniques are welcome. Through continuous development, the increasing application of digital methods in diagnostics and treatments will provide benefits for both patients and physicians.
