Personalized Medicine in Oral and Maxillofacial Diseases

Message from the Guest Editors

Driven by personalized medicine, oral and maxillofacial surgery is also undergoing continuous development, including accurate diagnosis of diseases through genome sequencing, epigenetic analysis, and radiomics, this approach offers the potential for earlier detection of malignancies; Through combine the precise surgery with artificial intelligence and machine learning, it can improve surgical precision, optimize postoperative recovery, and promote better long-term outcomes through personalized risk assessment and follow-up plans, thereby better managing complex diseases such as oral cancer, craniofacial deformities, and temporomandibular joint disorders. This special issue focuses on the intersection of personalized medicine and oral and maxillofacial diseases, aims to explore how personalized approaches can lead to more effective, targeted, and efficient treatment for patients. We invite scholars and clinicians to submit original research articles and comprehensive reviews that contribute to the advancement of personalized medicine in the field of oral and maxillofacial surgery.
