Personalized Clinical and Community Nursing

Message from the Guest Editors

This Special Issue of the Journal of Personalized Medicine aims to highlight the current state of the nursing science and showcase the latest evidence in the field of the personalized care that nurses provide in clinical and community settings. This Special Issue welcomes manuscripts focusing on personalized approaches relevant to nursing care in clinical and community domains, in assessment, planning, and implementation, manuscripts about the conceptual and theoretical frameworks, and original or review papers that describe and give evidence of the influence of the factors that affect all aspects of individualized nursing care: physical, mental, social, spiritual, emotional, cultural, economic, environmental.
