Message from the Guest Editors

The health economy is driven by tourism in many destinations, countries and even regions. Therefore, it is of great importance to analyse this part of the economy accordingly, and to predict future events credibly without misleading stories or discussions. Moreover, analysing past events could bring tourism to a higher level of productivity, customer satisfaction and price adjustment. Therefore, this Special Issue focuses on various strategies and methods for the tourism and hospitality industry.

It is of great importance to address the gaps in the strategic economic analysis of the tourism and hospitality sector by including the main economic and econometric findings in this Special Issue, in support of this research field. Potential topics include tourism economics, econometrics and tourism, quantitative research in tourism, hospitality and inflation, prices in tourism, inflation risks, volatility in cryptocurrencies, urban tourism, spatial tourism, strategies in tourism, time series and forecasting in tourism and unit root tests in tourism.
