Message from the Guest Editor

Women have written for thousands of years. However, modern times separate women from earlier times following unprecedented changes. In some parts of the world, women only emerged on the horizon of society via writing. Writing was not public for some women until modern times, which facilitated and also incumbered women's writing. Furthermore, factors such as industrialization, capitalism, urbanization, politics, public space, printing brought about new features of women's writing. In the Special Issue, we investigate the dynamic relationship between women's writing and modern times.

This Special Issue focuses on the issues and perspectives that arise from the complexities the modern period has brought to women's writing. The approaches and areas of study include but not limited to the following: cultural studies, arts and science, comparative literature, world literature, literary relations, literary theory, postcolonial and migration, children, and gender studies.
