Calcium Phosphate in Biomedical Applications

Message from the Guest Editor

In the last ten years, the use of calcium phosphate materials has drastically increased. They have been chemically modified (Ca/P ratio, doping, etc.), physically modified (pore size, pore structure, etc.), and many other. Many studies included in vivo and or in vivo experiments. In the present Special Issue, we propose to edit articles that present those modifications and their application in the dentistry, orthopedic, vaccination, bacteriology, immunology, etc.
