Advances in Oral Implantology and Related Surgeries

Message from the Guest Editors

Dental implants had been a widely accepted treatment modality for fully or partially edentulous patients in recent years improving function, esthetics, and stability. This Special Issue encourages researchers and clinicians to submit original research articles, technical notes, review articles, and systematic reviews that address the update on oral implantology and related surgeries. Potential topics include but are not limited to the following:

- Biomaterials in the fabrication of dental implants.
- The development in implant designs, surface modifications and coatings.
- The most recent surgical techniques and protocols for dental implant osteotomy.
- Sinus lifting in association with dental implants.
- Custom implants using three-dimensional (3D) printing.
- Zygomatic implants.
- TMJ implants.
- Ridge splitting.
- Orthognathic surgery for implant placement.
- Distraction osteogenesis for dental implants.
- Strategies in the application of dental implants in medically compromised patients suffering from local or systemic diseases interfering with implant surgery with special concern to medication-related osteonecrosis of the jaw (MRONJ) as one of those recent diseases
