Emergency Medicine and Emergency Room Medical Issues

Message from the Guest Editor

Hospitals or healthcare institutions are at risk of being overburdened, physicians are at risk of burnout, and emergency departments are clogged up. All previous items are hot topics in the area of emergency medicine; yet, together with several systems to counteract the overbooking of emergency rooms in order to improve hospital discharge (e.g., telemedicine, improvements for access to care for primary care and specialty services), a professional update remains the best resource for physicians, in particular, the ability to manage diagnostic suspects for rare diseases with the chance of early diagnosis and treatment. We invite colleagues around the world to report their clinical experiences with case series or case reports in emergency medicine and/or emergency rooms for this collection of our journal. Clinical contributions regarding acute illnesses, such as infections, thrombosis, bleeding, inflammation, autoimmune diseases, trauma, and any type of emergency diagnostic rare procedure, are welcome for this collection.
