

Special Issue

Anesthesiology, Resuscitation, and Pain Management

Message from the Guest Editors

The disciplines of anesthesiology, resuscitation, and pain management have evolved over the last years to become sophisticated, evidence-based medical specialties. Together, they represent a cornerstone of patient care in both acute and chronic settings, aiming to enhance survival, comfort, and quality of life. The aim and scope of this Special Issue is to support research in the field by providing a context where the experts and authors can present their opinion and their research results. This Special Issue will focus on cutting-edge research, with a preference for studies or investigations that are at the forefront of scientific or technological advancement. In particular, we welcome research that

- Explores new, innovative ideas or methods;
- Pushes the boundaries of current knowledge;
- Often involves advanced technologies, novel theories, or experimental techniques;
- May lead to breakthrough discoveries or new applications in a field.

We are soliciting original research papers, systematic reviews, and clinical studies that contribute to the advancement of knowledge and practice in the fields of anesthesiology, resuscitation, and pain medicine.
