Caring in Emergency Settings: Nursing, Professional Practices, and Shared Experiences

Message from the Guest Editors

Emergency care settings are among the most complex and demanding environments in healthcare, requiring rapid, effective, and humane care delivery. This Special Issue aims to explore various dimensions of care in urgent contexts, including both professional nursing practices and informal care provided by families and non-professional caregivers. We seek to illuminate the technical and organizational challenges as well as the emotional, ethical, and interpersonal experiences involved in critical care moments. We welcome original research, case studies, reviews, and reflective narratives on topics such as clinical decision-making, interdisciplinary collaboration, nursing staff resilience, ethical dilemmas, and emergency nursing education, while also addressing the family's role in supporting individuals in crisis. Through this Special Issue, we aim to promote critical reflection on care in its broadest sense—recognizing its technical aspects alongside its human, relational, and community-based dimensions. We look forward to your valuable contributions to this important and evolving area of nursing science.
