Nutrient Composition and Nutrition/Health-Related Claims

Message from the Guest Editor

I am pleased to invite contributions of original research or reviews to the Special Issue "Nutrient Composition and Nutrition/Health-Related Claims".

Unhealthy eating is one of the four main risk factors in regard to noncommunicable diseases in the world. In addition, institutions need information to be able to establish public health measures to protect consumers. For this reason, research on the nutrient composition of commercially available foods is essential. Changes in nutrient composition over time are also critical to monitoring formulation modifications carried out by the food industry in response to public health initiatives.

It has been commonly found that consumers' perception of foods is influenced by the presence of nutrition and health claims. Foods that carry these claims are often considered as healthy or healthier than those that do not.

This Special Issue aims at providing valuable research on these topics. Manuscripts on the nutrient composition of foods are welcome, as they will help to unveil the nutrition quality of foods in the market. In addition, works on nutrition and health-related claims are also encouraged.
