Food Security: Addressing Global Malnutrition and Hunger

Message from the Guest Editors

In recent years, the frequency of various disasters, conflicts, emergencies, and the impacts of climate change have increased globally, resulting in large numbers of communities affected, with vulnerable people being more exposed and often directly dependent on food aid. Based on current levels and past trends, the WHO's global nutrition targets are not likely to be fully met by 2030. Therefore, scientific research supporting continued investment in preventive and treatment efforts is crucial to prevent regression. This Special Issue invites submission of systematic reviews, narrative reviews, scoping reviews, and meta-analyses exploring various aspects of food security and malnutrition, including but not limited to the following areas: How food insecurity can impact child growth and development; Current levels and trends of the WHO global nutrition targets; Original research on dietary patterns of age-related nutritional status in areas or communities where food insecurity exists; Interventions in the field of public health and nutritional policies capable of reducing, mitigating, or controlling global malnutrition.
