Editorial Board Members' Collection Series: Interventions Addressing Risk Factors Contributing to Cardiometabolic Diseases among the Elderly

Message from the Guest Editors

Population ageing has considerable societal and economic implications and the balance between the challenges and opportunities associated with population ageing largely depends on whether people age in good or poor health. Non-communicable diseases (NCDs) are the leading cause of global mortality and are also responsible for the overwhelming burden of disease in the elderly. Despite the importance of prevention and management of CMDs to improve elderly health, current approaches to their control seem to be less successful in developing countries. The aim of this Special Edition is to identify successful interventions/ strategies that have been implemented to address CMD risk factors among the elderly. Strategies, technologies or tools that can assist in positively impact on modifiable lifestyle behaviors are of special interest. We encourage all researchers working in relevant fields to submit original research papers, reviews, systematic reviews, and meta-analyses to this Special Edition with the aim of broadening human knowledge on this challenge.
