Nutrition for the Prevention and Control of Chronic Degenerative Diseases

Message from the Guest Editor

Chronic degenerative diseases (CDDs), represented by non-infectious diseases with a long duration and slow progression, including obesity, heart disease, diabetes, neurodegenerative diseases, chronic respiratory diseases, and cancer, are the most frequent causes of prolonged disability and death worldwide. Patients with one or more CDD represent over 30% of the global population, and 70% of public health resources are dedicated to these diseases. In the meantime, infectious diseases caused by emerging pathogens, such as SARS-Coronavirus 2 (SARS-CoV-2), represent a real and current threat at global level. The relationship between CDDs and viral infection susceptibility is undeniable. Following the emergence of COVID-19, recent publications have demonstrated that the most serious clinical conditions in COVID-19 patients have been observed in people with obesity and metabolic dysfunction, as well as in protein-energetic malnourishment and micronutrient deficiencies. Authors are invited to submit original research and review articles that address the progress and current understanding of the role of personalized healthy and sustainable diet in CDD and COVID-19.
