

Special Issue

Food Labeling and Consumer Behaviors

Message from the Guest Editors

This Special Issue is aimed at providing selected contributions that examine the mechanisms, effectiveness, and implications of food labeling on consumer behaviors, with a particular emphasis on consumers' willingness to pay, policy interventions, and methodological innovations. Potential topics include, but are not limited to, the following:

- Consumers' preferences or willingness to pay for various food labels;
- Effectiveness of different types of food labels on food choices;
- Effect of food labels on dietary intake, purchasing behavior, and long-term health outcomes;
- Socio-demographic differences in label use and perception;
- Integration of digital technologies to enhance the utility of food labels;
- Field experiments and natural experiments evaluating label-related interventions;
- Mechanisms underlying consumers' behaviors toward food labels;
- Cross-country comparisons of labeling policies and consumer responses.
