Neonatal Health: Neurodevelopment, Growth, and Nutrition

Message from the Guest Editors

The subject of nutrition, growth, and neurodevelopment is of great importance in pediatrics and presents many possibilities for research and study. Nutrition and growth go hand in hand in early childhood, and their translation to neurodevelopment is crucial and highly topical. In the field of neonatology, neonatal nutrition is essential in the neurodevelopment of newborns born prematurely. In many other areas of pediatrics as well, this relationship is vital. The nutrition of children with chronic pathologies or nutrition in societies of the less developed world, and its impact on their neurodevelopment are also topics of great interest in the pediatric world. We hope that this Special Issue can be very attractive to neonatologists, pediatricians, and nutritionists. We welcome short communications, related original research articles, and clinical studies, as well as review articles, for this Special Issue. Thank you for considering this Special Issue as an outlet for your research on Neonatal Health: Neurodevelopment, Growth, and Nutrition.
