

Special Issue

The Economics, Environment and Policies That Influence Nutrition Management in Healthcare

Message from the Guest Editor

This Special Issue aims to explore the complex and interconnected dimensions that shape nutrition management within any healthcare settings. We welcome the submission of both original research articles and reviews to provide a comprehensive understanding of how economic, environmental, and policy factors interact to influence nutrition management in healthcare. We also welcome studies that delve into the economic implications of nutritional interventions, offering insights into the overall economic value that these interventions provide to patient care and healthcare systems, in addition to studies utilising Patient-Reported Outcome Measures (PROMs) and Patient-Reported Experience Measures (PREMs) to measure the impact of nutritional interventions to improve the quality of care assessment. Finally, we invite contributions that investigate policies acting as enablers or barriers to effective nutritional care. This includes examining institutional, regional, and national policies, and their impact on the implementation and sustainability of nutritional interventions, programs or frameworks.
