Nutritional Management for Pediatric Chronic Disease

Message from the Guest Editor

Nutrition and lifestyle factors are important determinants of health risk in children and adolescents. Pediatric patients with chronic illnesses or diseases or who require long-term nutrition support are most vulnerable to nutrition-related issues. For chronic diseases in children, the impact of dietary interventions on improving the health of children and adolescents needs to be assessed. This will provide evidence-based dietary recommendations for the prevention and treatment of chronic diseases in young adults and guide clinicians, public health researchers, and policymakers in their implementation.

The focus of this Special Issue is on how nutrition affects health outcomes in children in terms of both prevention and treatment of chronic disease and details related to the dietary management of specific diseases. Increasing our knowledge in this area will assist in developing evidence-based nutrition guidelines for the prevention and management of chronic conditions in children and adolescents.
